

Which direction for a career?

To examine your career options, you should first gather as much information as possible.

Here are some places where you can get advice.

School

Your careers library will have some basic information on a variety of occupations. Ask the librarian questions like:

- What does someone with this job do?
- What subjects do I need to study?
- What courses are available?
- How long will it take to train?

Also use careers advisors to expand your list of career ideas by finding out about related options. Many schools have work experience programs which give you the chance to check out a job which interests you.

Career Information Centres

Resources in these centres include printed information about jobs, and tertiary study reference materials such as university and college handbooks. There are 12 Career Information Centres throughout the country. Assistance from staff is also available.

Employers

You could talk to employers in areas you find interesting. You might ask them questions such as:

- What are the most demanding aspects of the work?
- What is the most preferred method of working?
- Are there courses which will prepare me for the work?

Parents, friends, relatives

Relatives and friends can be helpful in giving you insights into the daily routine of an occupation. By questioning them, you can expand your knowledge of the work. Another option is to use this group to arrange industry contacts or check out possible job vacancies.

Universities and colleges

These institutions have careers advisors to help prospective students. You can also take part in their open days. During these days, you can look at the facilities offered- and chat to teachers and lecturers.

Internet

Don't forget the Internet. One great site to visit is the government careers directory.

Getting it all together

You will no doubt, gather lots of information. It's easy to forget details, so you should collect your information using a folder or filing system to ensure that your information is kept up-to-date.
