Why some women cross the finish line ahead of men

RECRUITMENT

The course is tougher but women are staying the distance, reports Andrew Crisp.

- A Women who apply for jobs in middle or senior management have a higher success rate than m to an employment survey. But of course far fewer of them apply for these positions. The study, consultants NB Selection, shows that while one in six men who appear on interview shortlists g figure rises to one in four for women.
- The study concentrated on applications for management positions in the $45,000 to $110,000 stand found that women are more successful than men in both the private and public sectors Dr Marx from London-based NB Selection described the findings as encouraging for women, in the positive message to them to apply for interesting management positions. But she added, "We saight of the fact that significantly fewer women apply for senior positions in comparison with me
- Reasons for higher success rates among women are difficult to isolate. One explanation sugge a woman candidate manages to get on a shortlist, then she has probably already proved herse exceptional candidate. Dr Marx said that when women apply for positions they tend to be better their male counterparts but are more selective and conservative in their job search. Women tender thoroughly before applying for positions or attending interviews. Men, on the other hand, seem ability to sell themselves and to convince employers that any shortcomings they have will not purpose the property of the property of
- Managerial and executive progress made by women is confirmed by the annual survey of board carried out by Korn/Ferry/Carre/ Orban International. This year the survey shows a doubling of women serving as non-executive directors compared with the previous year. However, progres painfully slow and there were still only 18 posts filled by women out of a total of 354 nonexecution surveyed. Hilary Sears, a partner with Korn/Ferry, said, "Women have raised the level of grade employed in but we have still not broken through barriers to the top."
- E In Europe a recent feature of corporate life in the recession has been the delayering of manage structures. Sears said that this has halted progress for women in as much as de-layering has to either where women are working or in layers they aspire to. Sears also noted a positive trend from recession, which has been the growing number of women who have started up on their own.
- In business as a whole, there are a number of factors encouraging the prospect of greater equivorkforce. Demographic trends suggest that the number of women going into employment is st increasing. In addition a far greater number of women are now passing through higher education them better qualified to move into management positions.
- Organisations such as the European Women's Management Development Network provide a reportunities for women to enhance their skills and contacts. Through a series of both pan-European workshops and conferences the barriers to women in employment are being broken do Ariane Berthoin Antal, director of the International Institute for Organisational Change of Archar said that there is only anecdotal evidence of changes in recruitment patterns. And she said, "It's for women to even get on to shortlists -there are so many hurdles and barriers.' Antal agreed the been some positive signs but said "Until there is a belief among employers, until they value the nothing will change."
